I. Group Topic Brainstorming

During our brainstorming, each of us suggested a social issue that we believe is relevant to the Philippines today and can be connected to the life or writings of Dr. José Rizal. We also considered whether we could make a simple and practical social action project about each topic.

1. Gjia

Proposed Topic: "The Price of Being Poor": How Small Financial Barriers Create Bigger Inequality

- Even small expenses for transportation, documents, school requirements, or basic services can be difficult for families with limited income.
- In El Filibusterismo, Cabesang Tales experiences land-related injustice and financial hardship. His story shows how unfair systems can make life harder for ordinary people.
- We think this topic is important because small costs can add up and prevent people from accessing opportunities.
- A possible project would be to prepare easy-to-follow guides about available school assistance or public services and their requirements.

2. Angel

Proposed Topic: "From Friars to Influencers": Blind Obedience to Powerful Personalities

- Some people easily trust statements from influencers, celebrities, or powerful figures without checking the information.
- In Noli Me Tangere, Padre Damaso and Padre Salvi show how powerful people can influence the beliefs and decisions of others.
- We think students should learn to question claims respectfully and look for evidence instead of believing something only because a popular person said it.
- A possible project would be a discussion and simple activity about checking claims made by influential people.

3. Jeff

Proposed Topic: "Viral ang Isyu, Tahimik ang Aksyon": Performative Activism

- We often see social issues go viral. People may share posts or react online, but we want to know whether online awareness also leads to real involvement.
- In Noli Me Tangere, Ibarra tries to help his community by establishing a school. In El Filibusterismo, Isagani and other students work together to push for educational reform.
- Rizal also taught students and helped his community while living in Dapitan. These examples remind us that concern for others can lead to practical action.
- A possible project would be to encourage students to join one simple volunteer activity, using social media to invite and organize participants.

4. Dinesse

Proposed Topic: "Guilty Before Proven Innocent": Trial by Social Media

- People can be judged or criticized online before the full story or evidence is known.
- In Noli Me Tangere, Ibarra is linked to an uprising and suffers from accusations. In El Filibusterismo, students face suspicion after the pasquinades incident.
- This is relevant today because online accusations can damage reputations, even before the facts are checked.
- A possible project would be a student workshop about fair judgment, responsible posting, and checking facts.

II. Our Chosen Topic

Selected Topic: "Viral ang Isyu, Tahimik ang Aksyon": Performative Activism (Jeff's suggestion)

After discussing our four choices, we decided to choose Jeff's topic on performative activism. We chose it because we can relate to it as students who use social media almost every day. We often see people, including ourselves, sharing or reacting to posts about social issues. We want to find out how this awareness can encourage us to do something helpful in our community.

We do not believe that sharing posts is always a bad thing. Online advocacy can spread information, encourage donations, and invite volunteers. We also understand that not everyone has the time or money to join activities. Our focus is not to judge people, but to help students find realistic ways to take part.

We see a connection to Rizal's works because Ibarra tried to build a school and the students in El Filibusterismo worked together for reform. Rizal's service in Dapitan also shows how we can help others through simple, useful actions. This topic fits our project because we can survey students, organize a small volunteer activity, and evaluate what we learned.

Proposed Project Title: From Posts to Purpose: Turning Online Awareness into Real Community Action

Our project title, participants, and activities are still subject to group discussion and approval.

III. Initial Situation Analysis

A. What Is the Issue?

Performative activism happens when someone publicly shows support for a cause mainly to look concerned or gain approval, without genuine interest in helping that cause. However, we cannot judge a person's intentions from one post alone. Sharing accurate information can also be a useful form of activism.

Our group wants to study the gap between being aware of social issues online and having the chance to take meaningful action. We will focus on college students and the practical things that may help them participate.

B. Why Does It Happen?

Some possible reasons are:

- Students may be busy with schoolwork or family responsibilities.
- Some volunteer activities require transportation money, time, or other resources.
- Students may not know where to find safe and trustworthy volunteer opportunities.
- Trending posts and online reactions can sometimes receive more attention than follow-up activities.
- Some people may want to help but do not know where to start.

We will not assume these reasons are true for everyone. We plan to ask students about their experiences and look for reliable studies about youth activism.

C. Who May Be Affected?

Our possible participants are college students from our school or a nearby student organization. A partner community may also benefit if we organize a volunteer activity based on a need they identify.

If awareness does not lead to opportunities for participation, students may miss chances to contribute and learn through service. However, we also recognize that online sharing can be useful, especially for people who cannot join activities in person.

D. What Can We Do About It?

We can start by asking students how they engage with social issues, what prevents them from volunteering, and what simple activities they would consider joining. We can hold a short discussion about meaningful action and invite them to one manageable community activity, if a school or community partner approves it.

We will use reliable references about youth activism, and we will review the relevant events in Rizal's novels. Our goal is to connect awareness with action, not to criticize students who have limited time or resources.

IV. Connection to Rizal

A. Noli Me Tangere

Crisostomo Ibarra plans to establish a school because he believes education can improve his community. This connects to our project because he tries to turn an idea into something useful. We want students to see that caring about a problem can be a starting point for small, practical actions.

B. El Filibusterismo

Isagani, Makaraig, and other students work together to request a Spanish-language academy. Although their effort faces resistance, their story shows young people organizing around an issue that matters to them. We can learn from their willingness to participate and cooperate.

C. Rizalian Values We Can Apply

- Education: We should understand an issue before deciding how to help.
- Responsibility: We should be sincere and careful about the causes we support.
- Cooperation: We can do more when we work with others.
- Service: We can use our time and skills to help our community.
- Love of country: Small actions that serve others are one way of showing concern for our society.

Rizal did not write about social media or performative activism. We are applying the lessons from his novels, together with his work in Dapitan, to an issue we experience today.

V. Possible Social Action Project

From Posts to Purpose: Turning Online Awareness into Real Community Action

Main Goal: To encourage students to turn their awareness of social issues into simple and meaningful community participation.

Our group is considering the following activities:

1. Quick Student Survey - Ask around 30-50 willing students how they support causes online, whether they have volunteered, and what makes participation difficult.

2. From Posts to Purpose Discussion - Hold a short conversation about useful online advocacy, volunteer opportunities, and Rizal's example of service.

3. One Small Action Challenge - Invite students to sign up for one low-cost activity based on a need identified by a partner school or community.

4. Community Volunteer Activity - Carry out the chosen activity, such as a supervised cleanup and proper waste segregation, with permission and guidance.

5. Feedback and Reflection - Ask participants what they learned, record actual participation, and discuss how they could join future activities.

These are initial suggestions. We will choose the final community activity based on what our partner actually needs and what we can safely and realistically do.

VI. Initial Action Plan

Possible Activity	Purpose	Expected Output	Schedule
Research and survey	Learn about student experiences and prepare materials	Survey summary and discussion guide	TBD
Short discussion	Explain the issue and Rizalian values	One discussion session	TBD
Volunteer invitation	Help students find a simple way to join	Volunteer sign-up list	TBD
Community activity	Turn awareness into practical help	One documented service activity	TBD
Feedback and evaluation	Check participation and gather suggestions	Attendance and feedback summary	TBD

Possible resources: Mobile phones, free online survey forms, internet access, presentation materials, drinking water, and basic activity supplies if needed.

Possible partners: Faculty adviser, student organizations, school offices, or a barangay representative, depending on availability and permission.

VII. Sustainability and Responsible Implementation

To help our project remain practical and useful, we may:

- Use free online tools and keep the activity small to avoid unnecessary expenses.
- Coordinate with an existing student organization or community partner rather than starting a new program that we cannot maintain.
- Choose an activity based on an actual community need and obtain permission before conducting it.
- Respect participants' privacy, ask for consent before taking or sharing photos, and avoid judging anyone who cannot volunteer.
- Share a simple guide on how students can join similar activities after our project ends.
- Use attendance, a short feedback form, and partner feedback to check what our project actually achieved.

We know that one event will not solve a major social issue or prove a lasting change in behavior. Still, we hope that our project can give students an easy first step toward volunteering and show that social media can be used to organize helpful actions.

Inspired by Ibarra, the student reformers in El Filibusterismo, and Rizal's work in Dapitan, we want to remind ourselves that we can begin helping our community through small, realistic efforts.
